The devastating fire in Butte County is putting extra stress on Bay Area food banks, which are now providing supplies to families displaced by the Camp Fire.

A convoy of food and supplies was expected to leave on Friday from Concord, bound for Oroville where it would be distributed to survivors of the state's deadliest wildfire in Butte County.

Neatly packed and towering boxes filled 217 pallets at a warehouse used by the Food Banks of Contra Costa and Solano Counties. Workers were busy loading trucks early on Friday morning.

"It helps out a lot. It's a good feeling that we're out there to help these people," said Galen Stockdale, the warehouse's manager.

The fire had killed 88 people and destroyed more than 13,000 homes before it was declared fully contained on Nov. 25.
